1. Field of the Invention
This invention relates to an ignition timing detecting system for an internal combustion engine, more particularly, to an ignition timing detecting system for an engine having a cylinder that is connected with its injector through a timing belt and other related mechanisms.

2. Description of the Related Art
An ignition timing detecting system for an internal combustion engine is known in the art from Japanese Laid-Open Patent Application No. 6-238548, for example. This related ignition timing detecting system comprises a rotary detector that rotates together with a timing pulley fixed to a crankshaft and detects a rotational phase of the timing pulley, a detection signal from the rotary detector is supplied to a comparison circuit to compare the detection signal with a predetermined signal, a high-voltage circuit for producing a high voltage based on the comparison result and supplying the high voltage to an ignition coil, and a controller for supplying an ignition enabling signal to the high-voltage circuit when the rotational phase of the timing pulley coincides with a predetermined phase and not supplying the ignition enabling signal when the rotational phase of the timing pulley is different from the predetermined phase.

In the prior art system, however, since a coil of the ignition coil is wound around a crankshaft of an engine, the ignition coil is easily affected by centrifugal forces and torque created by the crankshaft.

Therefore, the coil is likely to act as a load on the crankshaft, and the crankshaft is likely to vibr
